Abstract

The purpose of this research is to find out the types of English collocations and error collocation found in 56 abstracts of thesis writing at Institut Pendidikan SoE. The data was analyzed using a descriptive qualitative method, allowing for a thorough and detailed presentation of the findings. The findings of the research revealed two main types of collocation; grammatical and lexical, with illustrative examples presented for each category. There were 3 error collocation found in students' abstract specifically in Grammatical collocation. The data analysis emphasizes the importance of collocation accuracy in academic writing. In summary, this research reveals various of English collocations employed by students in their thesis abstracts and offered some practical advice for IPS and future researchers.

Introduction

Every student pursuing an undergraduate honors program, master's degree, or doctoral degree is typically required to write a thesis as their final project in order to complete their studies. Morreale et al, in Richard Nordquist(2020) stated that a good thesis tells the audience exactly what you want them to know, understand, and remember. Components in the thesis process include developing clear research question, writing a quality literature review, forming theoretically-based expectation and hypothesis, constructing a sound research design, collecting data, demonstrating appropriate analysis techniques, and articulating the importance of the thesis findings to an area of defense and security. One of the important parts of thesis writing is an abstract.

An abstract is a required element for scientific works, including theses, intended for publication in journals. A concise summary of the contents of the thesis is typically included in the abstract, which is normally placed following the title of manuscript. As a result, the abstract is usually referred to as a short summary. The information in abstract should encourage readers to read the whole thing. In other words, the abstract should tell readers that
